Having lived overseas while in the Navy, I do not think the problems of Irene and power restoration were (overall) as serious as many seemed to make them out to be. Given the statewide extent of the damage caused by the storm in Connecticut, and surrounding states, with the result that other power crews were not immediately available, I believe that CL&P did everything that was possible to restore power safely and, with priority to critical areas, like hospitals.

I was revolted when I heard some people complaining that their children had to entertain themselves with board games because their electricity was out!
